US and EU call presidential elections 'neither free nor fair,' Opposition of war-battered country terms polls a farce

DAMASCUS

SYRIAN President Bashar al-Assad dismissed criticism of his country's presidential election on Wednesday as voters flocked to the polls in government-held areas despite Western accusations it was neither "free nor fair". "Your opinions have zero value," Assad said, after voting with his wife Asma in the Damascus suburb of Douma, a key rebel stronghold until its recapture by government forces three years ago. The United States and the European Union said the election was "neither free nor fair," and Syria's fragmented opposition has called it a "farce".

But they will watch powerless as Assad prepares to renew his grip on power. Few doubt ic crisis. Huge election posters Assad will trounce his two virtually unknown challengers to win a fourth term, in a war-battered country mired in economglorifying the president have mushroomed across the twothirds of the country. The controversial vote is the second election since the start of a decade-long civil war.

With opponents abroad barred from standing and no voting in the swathes of territory outside government control, Assad is expected to win by a landslide. State TV showed long queues forming outside polling stations after voting opened at 7 am. Hundreds of students clamoured to vote outside Damascus University. "I came to vote for Bashar al-Assad because he is the only man who withstood 10 years of war," said 26-vear-old Kinan al-Khatib. The result is not expected before Friday evening. AFP
